The Conservative government has proposed to take control of royalties. It would put them under the authority of the Crown, like in the United States, but under much tighter control. Unlike, say, royalty money in Alberta, which the province has traditionally passed on to its citizens and the industry that used it, the Conservatives would be able to control royalties for the oil and gas sector.. According to data provided by the government to CBC News in 2012, about $16 billion (£12 billion) worth of oil revenue is returned to the Canadian taxpayer every year.. But then in 2009, the oil price collapsed. By 2011 the cost of oil had sunk back into the pockets of a minority. The current price of oil is at just under $25 per barrel. The federal government is not going to raise the price of a barrel of oil for the benefit of the majority.

To estimate the long-term supply decline, the study used three main factors:

- The price of oil (adjusted for inflation) over the period from early 2009 to the end of 2010.
- The oil cost of producing at least one barrel of oil per day (b/d) (adjusted for inflation) from September 2008 to mid-September 2010.
- The oil-to-construction ratio for the production year and the average rate of inflation (from late 2008 to late 2013) of all the major oil-producing countries combined.

• The average oil file.. The government estimates that between $30 billion and $50 billion (depending on how you figure it) could be recovered at a rate of about $17 to $20 a barrel of oil. That was in 2012 dollars.. "The money and the power is with the Crown and that's where I've long wanted to see it.."
